Following an additional investigation against trainee flight controller Svetlana Krivsun the case against her has been dismissed because no traces of the crime under part 3 of article 263 of the Russian Criminal Code were found in her actions.

The investigators revealed that the snowplow had had no failures or technical devices set on it.

On 25 January 2016, the accused and their lawyers were notified about the end of investigation in accordance with article 215 of the Criminal Procedure Code.

The accused and their lawyers are going to start the files of the case on 26 January 2016 in accordance with article 217 of the Criminal Procedure Code.

After the accused and their lawyers have finished reading the files, the case will be sent to the Prosecutor General's Office for the indictment to be approved and then to be sent to court to be tried on the merits.
