amount at the rate of the Bank of Russia of more than 25 million rubles. This led to the illegal return of funds previously seized by customs officials.

During the inquiry, the investigation established the expensive real estate of Kizlyk in the Moscow region. During a search at his place of residence, funds, jewellery, gold bars, luxury watches, icons of historical value, and other values were seized from him. The total cost of the property is over 150 million rubles. This is many times higher than the income of Kizlyk for the entire period of service, which is a violation of anti-corruption legislation. Considering the discovery and seizure of the property of the accused by the investigation, the General Prosecutor's Office of the Russian Federation appealed to the Meshchansky District Court of Moscow and a claim for his conversion to state revenue, which was satisfied.

The court will examine all the materials presented in the criminal case on the involvement of the perpetrators in the alleged crimes.
